In the Ma language, the river is called Da Dang, and according to the Ma folk legends, the place was one known as the MA principality. The MA people cultivate upland rice and worship the Rice Mother, but they continue to re-enact the custom of sacrificing buffaloes as a mean of recalling the days when they hunted for big animals to survive. Their typical dwelling is a long house on stilts, which retains architectural traces of the caves where they used to live by means of the structure of the POONG ME (mother door). The Ma family structure follows the paternal line, but the practice of matriarchal relations still exists"".

""This Gazetteer provides brief information on the administrative units of Vietnam, from communes & wards (the lowest level of the administrative system) up to the provinces, and the cities which come directly under central government control. Each entry begins with the name of the units & a brief indication of its location in the administrative system. Except in the cases of commune level units and old names, there follows information on the area, population, geography, economy, transport, history, and administrative component of the area. If relevant there are also indications of the major tourist attraction to be found there. For old names, that is ones no longer in use, a brief history of past changes is given"".
