This book, Syed Arabi Idid : Scholarship in Transformation lived up to its title as one that seeks to empirically and systematically transform our understandings of the many facets of our daily life including our usage of media, our relationship with others and how all of that affects our political system. It is a refreshing book that chronicles the development of local social sciences knowledge from the eyes of an experienced scholar and most of all, makes us question the direction of upcoming research.

Declassified - Moving Beyond The Dead End Of Race In South Africa / Gerhard Mare

Jacana Media, South Africa 2014

200p.;

$ 28.50 / HB

Twenty years after the end of apartheid, race still continues to play a role in South African society. Now, however, it is a black majority government that is demanding and maintaining race thinking, in an effort to redress the discrimination of the past.

Both the Employment Equity Act and the Black Economic Empowerment Act, for instance, use the racial categories of apartheid to achieve their ends, but the demand to classify people racially extends beyond business to many other areas of life. Ironically, in a society that is constitutionally committed to non-racialism, race thinking and race classification have been carried forward unthinkingly from our past. Not only does the rationale for such continuation not address the real concerns of our society but the system of classifying carries inevitable seeds of conflict within itself. What is more, the classification of fellow human beings into races remains a crime against humanity, no matter what justification is offered.

The South African Marang Men's Project : HIV Bio-Behavioural Surveys Conducted Among Men Who Have Sex with Men in Cape Town, Durban and Johannesburg Using Respondent-Driven Sampling / LC Simbayi, T Rehle
HSRC Press, South Africa 2014

To date, there is a dearth of surveillance data on the prevalence of HIV and associated risk behaviours among men who have sex with men (MSM) in South Africa. This is particularly true for data collected from several sites using the same sampling approach.

This study called the Marang Men's Project was undertaken to fill this information gap. It was implemented among MSM in the three largest cities of South Africa, namely, Cape Town in the Western Cape, Durban in KwaZulu-Natal and Johannesburg in Gauteng.

The high HIV prevalence estimates found in our study among MSM in each of the three study cities call for a need to implement a national HIV bio-behavioural surveillance programme for MSM.

The Marang Men's Project has demonstrated that there is an urgent need for interventions, which respond not only to the heterosexual HIV epidemic but also to the HIV epidemic among MSM in South Africa.
