"The Mission of the Newars" offers a refreshed view of the relationship between Nepalbhasa and Buddhism, an update of the vitality of both language and religion among the Buddhist Newars based on scientific fieldwork, and an original perspective on possible future developments of the language and religion synchronicity which is, as the author writes, part of "the genius of the Newars". If read between the lines, this essay by a French scholar is also, in his own word, "a love letter addressed to the Newar culture".

In the preparation of this volume, approaches in the analysis of data and language corpora have been able to shed light on aspects of the speech systems of the Orang Asli of the Malay Peninsula. The outcome of treating linguistic data in the synchronic and diachronic dimensions has enabled the writers to render interpretations not only of the micro aspects of their languages, but just as important on the relationship between the various groups and sub-groups. Linguistic evidence does not support such division between Proto-Malays and Deutero Malays.

While Orang Laut has been placed in the category of aborigines prone to life in the seas as opposed to land Orang Asli, history has shown that what are known as sea and land people were not fixed categories, as there had been changes in their geolinguistic status due the freedom they had in moving from one region to the other.

- 1.Malay language – History

The world's 290 million speakers of Malay draw their strength from the 1300-year history of Malay as a written language and the ever older oral traditions of their maritime ancestors. The Malay language has spread throughout Southeast Asia with outlier communities of Malay speakers in Holland, Australia and Sri Lanka.
