Matthias Mendezona is a prize winning poet and accomplished author of a personal memoir How Sweet the Mango, No but he now co-authors a book with his late friend and business associate Roberto Bobby Aboitiz, with the intriguing title, You Can't Save 80 Million Filipinos, but You Can Build Me a Park In this pithy tome, Mendezona recounts the experience of working together with the Aboitiz family an influential Filipino business clan based in the central Philippine province of Cebu and a Japanese partner to build what would become one of the biggest ship building sites in the region The book is valuable from several perspectives as a personal memoir relating the difficulties of establishing a greenfields industry in a developing country with its peculiar hydra of tradition, politics, bureaucracy, corruption etc. while raising one's family and building one's own career as a case study which could be taken up in a business school and the detailed observation of dealing with the many factors and varied role players involved in the transformation of an underdeveloped town into a competitive global role player in the shipping industry With a modern approach of including telling and relevant personal e mails, detailing ruminations on the factors which keep a country uncompetitive in a global economy, recording poignant moments of struggling towards success while grappling with social and even personal problems, the book could have a broad audience of Filipinos and foreigners alike as well as businessmen, investors and laymen....

"This book is a work of scholarship but also relevant to the advocacies of the time. It is worth the read from its first page to the last." - Associate Justice Marvic M.V.F. Leonen Supreme Court of the Philippines
This collection of Articles illustrates how the law can be used to subjugate marginalized sectors in the Philippines. Laws create hierarchies based on, among other things, class, ethnicity, or gender. These pieces were written during the course of a legal practice working with rural poor communities. They challenge hierarchies created by law and supports community efforts to pressure policy makers to review the unwritten premises of the law.
